

Review: It is impossible to forget the images that remain imprinted in our minds from the Holocaust of World War II. With over six million Jews murdered, Auschwitz stands as one of the more notorious, yet well-documented extermination camps of the Nazis. The film adaptation of Michal Hershkovits' novel Dining in America, which played a key role in the movie's development, is one of the first we're aware of. It was produced for Israeli television by the 60s pioneer Ze'ev Revach (1963-2013), who along with the late Shlomo Eshkol (2006-2014) spearheaded the documentary arm of Channel 1. Hershkovits' story is about a Polish couple and their Jewish son. On his way to the US, they are stopped at a German checkpoint in 1939. When the German officer in charge is told that the husband is a doctor, he orders them to the camp as an internment camp for Jews. There they are detained together, with the wife in her condition as a result of a car accident, until an attempt is made on the lives of the German officers. This is the basis for Hershkovits' screenplay. While the second part of the book "The Tailor" revolves around the drama of the prisoner's life and how he takes measures to protect his son's innocence, "Dining in America" leaves him alone in the middle of the camp. While the father is away working, his son becomes the plaything of the Germans and how he tries to protect him. It is not surprising that Hershkovits' book received little recognition, even though it was part of the Yiddish Book Center's Yiddish Book of the Month. According to the Center, "These photos of the internees in the Spiegelgrund camp's quarantine camp show a remarkable family unity, in a moment of despair." The director's initial intent was to produce the film and use his own photographs as illustrations. The archive of the filmmaker's photo collection contains a number of images depicting the quarantine camp. The title and the dramaturgy of the story were not conceived before filming. The format of the photographs and the location did not resemble the backdrop of the book. The core of the film was to be set in the camp and not in the husband's home. Filming took place in the late 1980s in the abandoned camp of the Spiegelgrund concentration camp. The original script, which included different scenes, was written

A Jewish waiter, his wife and their son are sent to a concentration camp where the waiter tries to protect his son's innocence by playing a game. A boy who believes he is a killer receives support from his father. At the end of the film, the father kills the boy to protect his innocence. There is a scene in the film where a child plays roulette to determine who he is and decides he is the killer. He calls him the name of the killer. This scene leads the viewer to believe that the child is lying and knows he is innocent. This scene also causes the viewer to feel guilty and ashamed of what is happening. "Why should I be ashamed of this kid,"
