Players, who lost their key-file, .Q: Compressing a file in memory in node.js I am looking to optimize my file transfer in node.js. My application is a microservice that will read a file in memory and then send the content of that file to a database. In addition to the database operation, I have a number of ways in which the file can be compressed before it's sent to the database, but that has been eliminated as an optimization for now. What would be the most efficient way to compress a file while it's in memory? I'm currently using the zlib module, but I'm curious if there's something better. A: As well as zlib, I would try out the rzip npm module. In a report filed last month, the Internet system monitoring firm Netcraft has revealed that it detected a small number of additional HTTP-powered websites that are currently under Russian government control. According to Netcraft, the list of 40 sites under the Kremlin's influence that it described on September 9 could increase by as much as 60% due to "regular changes" the company makes to its list. Russia already has a large roster of websites that it seeks to control, and these new additions to the list of sites that fall under its control, combined with changes in the category of sites, mean that the Kremlin now has at least 70 different sites that it seeks to influence or control. The only Russian language websites that are not listed are the four national news websites, the state-owned news agency TASS, the news website Vesti, and the news agency Interfax. While the Kremlin has been able to regularly change the list of websites that it controls, these latest additions are likely the result of large-scale, government-organized efforts to counter the Western influence that persists in Russian society. In September, Russia ordered journalists working for the independent news website RBK to stop publishing stories deemed to be "extremist" and "mocking Russia." "Stories on the Internet are read by anyone, including people working for the state agencies, and we can't allow such publications to continue to appear on the Internet," said Deputy Communications Minister Nikolai Nikifor candidates are running in the May 14 general election. Of those ridings, only one, on the southern outskirts of Delta, is on the list of 21 ridings, which calls for 38 school trustee candidates to be elected to replace the former trustees who resigned in April. The five-member commission, however, listed 28 candidates for each of the ridings, five fewer than were called for in the initial list. The number of seats was reduced to 17 ridings in the amended list because the commission dismissed as “insufficient” two ridings, one each on the north and south shores. The number of nominations for each riding was also reduced, from five to four for that riding. “Because the original list was insufficient, one of the original elected trustees on the south shore was allowed to retain his seat,” the commission wrote in its report released Tuesday. “Also, one of the four nominations for each riding is taken from an unelected trustee position.” The district’s population has increased by 4,100 since the last district elections in 2014 and the number of nominations was insufficient for ridings with 16,000 and 17,000 people in its boundaries, the commission wrote. The commission also noted the “non-voting role” of trustees, and that the trustee races are non-partisan. “The district is seeking a non-partisan electorate with the most recent Census data and field work showing strong community support for the maintenance of two incumbents,” the commission wrote. “The remaining trustees are supported by other parties or non-partisans.” In addition to the incumbent trustees, the commission recommended five people to fill the five trustee seats. Four of the people recommended were selected from nominees put forward by the Delta Teachers’ Union. The fifth, the sole alternate, is an at-large trustee 2d92ce491b
