Abstract Rational design of drug delivery systems requires insight into the effect of structural components and process parameters in the optimization of excipient combination. In this study we hypothesized that local mixing of individual dispersion components during drug extrusion can lead to a distinct release profile of the co-extruded mixture compared to monolithic systems. Therefore we systematically investigated the compatibility of drug with polymers and polymers with excipients during mixing in extrusion. Complex mixture of theophylline with xanthan was successfully co-extruded with a comparably low amount of magnesium stearate as a plasticizer. Clear differences in the drug release profile of the co-extruded mixture compared to the monolithic one could be shown. Calcium stearate and magnesium stearate had no influence on the release profile, which is in contrast to the physical mixture. However, the composition of the mixing components seemed to be important for the drug release. The polymer-polymer and polymer-excipient mixture had the same release profile as the monolithic systems. The results demonstrate that the combination of individual components with one another can lead to unexpected effects on the release profiles.

Best, Worst, and Social Media Influences on Dental Patient Altruism. Traditional understanding of the patient-physician relationship considers patients with common motivations, eg, altruism, empathy, and/or social motivation. However, social media and the internet can exert powerful influences on patients. This study hypothesizes that patient characteristics and social media use determine the degree to which patients are altruistic in online communities. A cross-sectional observational study of dentists' use of social media was completed on a social media platform's patient community. Data were collected on patient altruistic donations, most frequently donated reasons for donation, social media use, and respondent demographics. Respondents (n = 1,800) were 30 years of age or younger, included 41% men, 57% white, and 95% dentists. On a scale from 0 to 10, patients altruism average was 7.
