Households with small families are likely to be short paid by £2,400 per household annually when compared to households with large families, according to a report by the Social Mobility Commission. The report found small families – where no more than one child is aged under 11 and the other two or more are aged 11 or over – are likely to have incomes that are 13% lower per person than large families. In turn, small families are likely to be less well-off, compared to large families. The report also found that the lowest-skilled and disabled people in the UK are likely to be the worst affected. The report emphasised the need for increased competition in the economy, and suggested that if small families are paid more than big families, there will be increased competition among employees for better-paid jobs. It also suggested that small families need to be treated by the government as it affects social welfare payments and contribute to the work of government on these issues. Speaking about the findings, Lesley Cameron, chief executive of the Social Mobility Foundation, said: "Our research shows the UK has the lowest proportions of babies and babies per head of population of any of the 19 OECD countries, which is part of the reason why small families are less well-off in the UK. "If the UK economy is to be strengthened through further growth in human capital, there is a pressing need to raise people out of poverty and support those who need it, but also to make the UK better at retaining people with skills and knowledge." She added: "We find the proposed freeze on job-related childcare costs, or the old 'work-search-stay' policy, is likely to exacerbate the situation for disabled people and families with small families. "Not only is it unlikely to give disabled people the same chances as their able-bodied peers to fulfil their potential, it also risks reinforcing the stereotype that they are less-able or don't want to work. "All of this is a completely unnecessary step back in the right direction for social mobility." The report has come out as the government is seeking to plug a hole in its budget by freezing the level of support for childcare for three years. [A] December 2018 report from the Social Mobility Commission estimated that overall, UK families have seen their incomes decline by more than £2,300 since 2014, the time of the

As a Western fan of Greek mythology, I've realized that there is lots of information available on the internet about the modern Greek myths and legends. A lot of it is taken from the ancient works that were translated and published in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries by interested amateurs. I've always wanted to know more about Greek mythology, but haven't been able to find enough information. I like reading about mythology, but need more specific, in-depth information. I've often wondered where I can find stories and information about the Greek myths that I can read for pleasure or use as a study tool? Can you recommend some good sites to get some of this information? A: Michael Grant's Ancient Worlds is an accessible introduction to mythology. Greek and Roman mythology are discussed in separate volumes of the series. One of the most thorough sites for secondary literature would be Routledge's Mythology Classics, accessible via this website. A: The Oxford Classical Dictionary has a lot of useful material here. The websites listed below are sources that have links to many Greek mythological sites. Wikipedia's Greek Mythology The Mythology Handbook Books The Greek Myths: A Guide to the Ancient Classics by Jim Harre, (1994) A Companion to Greek Mythology by Sarah Rose (2000) Myth: A Very Short Introduction by Joseph Campbell (2003)
