Laminations are utilized to produce certain features or optically superimposed layers in metal substrates. For example, laminations are used to produce various features in steel, e.g., for use in fabricating parts of military equipment, farm implements, and the like. Laminations may be used to produce deep, e.g., greater than 0.03 inches, perforations in the metal surface, which may be used to control atmospheric inflow into the interiors of vessels, packages or bags of foodstuffs, and the like. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,203,940 of Lehtola et al. (hereinafter "the '940 patent") describes forming a continuous plurality of perforations, e.g., by cutting, in a steel surface to be used in fabricating shipping containers, the containers being of a size to fit on rail cars. U.S. Pat. No. 5,248,294 of Lehtola et al. (hereinafter "the '294 patent") describes forming a plurality of openings in a steel surface, e.g., a perforated sheet, and drawing the sheet in an overhead draw to dimensionally stabilize the openings and portions of the sheet surrounding the openings prior to hardening the sheet in a furnace. Although the lamination processes of the prior art operate to produce openings in metal substrates, they have a number of disadvantages. For example, lamination processes as carried out in the prior art can be prone to produce laminations having a relatively high percentage of defects, such as non-aligned perforations and non-perforated portions or edges of the laminations. Thus, certain features produced in a lamination according to the prior art can fail to meet quality standards dictated by specifications, such as military specifications. The use of electric current to fire the lamination may be increased in order to compensate for lamination defects. However, such techniques, which are normally intended to compensate for deficiencies in the material and cutting process, may actually increase the likelihood of failure of the laminations. Further, the electrical power used in firing a lamination according to the prior art may be subject to breakdown and high voltage operation of the lamination may be required. A lamination fired according to the prior art may require a minimum width of 20 inches in order to be robust to breaking as a result of exposure to cold, hardening temperatures,

Substance P induces activation of the NMDA receptor in medial habenular neurons of the rat. The habenular complex of the brain is a complex neuroanatomical structure that is involved in a variety of functions including the mediation of the stress response. Substance P has been reported to be present in the habenula and to be capable of producing inhibition of the firing of habenula neurons. Also, substance P is known to produce excitation of neurons in the thalamic parafascicular nucleus, a nucleus that is believed to be important for the generation of the stress response. In the present study, whole-cell patch-clamp recordings were made from rat medial habenular neurons in in vitro brain slice preparations. Substance P (2-10 microM) was found to increase the mean peak amplitude of NMDA (N-methyl-D-aspartate) receptor-mediated currents by 49% in a group of 26 habenula neurons. Substance P produced no significant change in the steady-state desensitization or kinetics of NMDA receptor-mediated currents, however, the rate of decay of the NMDA receptor-mediated currents was accelerated by 29% and the total reversal potential of the currents was depolarized by 6 mV. The endogenous peptide substance P would be capable of modulating cellular activity in the habenula by inhibiting the firing of thalamic neurons involved in the generation of the stress response and by activating habenula neurons that may be involved in the regulation of stress-related behaviours.
